

ABOUT THE AUTHORS

Richard Block, Professor of Sociology and Criminal Justice, began his study of Law as a graduate student at the University of Chicago working on several statistical projects at the Law School. As a Fulbright Scholar, he completed research on victims of crime while affiliated with the Law School of the University of Amsterdam, The Dutch Ministry of Justice, and the British Home Office. He is co-founder of the Homicide Research Working Group. For the past twelve years, he has been Project Director of the Judicial Development Project.

Katherine Cermak began her work on the Judicial Development Project as a graduate student at Loyola University of Chicago. Her areas of interest are expertise, occupations and professions, and science and technology. In 1997 she completed her thesis on the professionalism and expertise issues in the occupation of physical therapy. She has been Project Coordinator of the Judicial Development Project for four years.

Stephen Daniels is a Senior Research Fellow at the American Bar Foundation, Chicago, IL. He holds a Ph.D. in political science from the University of Wisconsin-Madison. His research interest is the American civil justice system, with a current focus on plaintiffs' lawyers in Texas and the impact of tort reform. Together with Joanne Martin, he is the author of Civil Juries and the Politics of Reform and numerous articles in interdisciplinary journals and law reviews covering such issues as tort reform, jury verdicts, punitive damages, medical malpractice, and product liability.

Robert Dingwall is Professor of Sociology and Director of the Institute for the Study of Genetics, Biorisks and Society at the University of Nottingham. He received a Ph.D. in medical sociology from the University of Aberdeen in 1974 and has worked at the Centre for Socio-Legal Studies at the University of Oxford and, as a visitor, at the American Bar Foundation, before moving to Nottingham in 1990. Within the law and society field, he has carried out research on agency decision-making in child abuse and neglect, medical negligence and asbestos disease litigation, the legal profession, and divorce mediation. Since 1997, he has been directing a research and graduate centre for the study of the social and legal implications of biological science and technology, including the new genetics.

Tom Durkin is currently teaching in the Department of Government & International Studies at the University of South Carolina. He previously taught at the University of Florida and was a researcher at the American Bar Foundation.

Cynthia Fuchs Epstein is Distinguished Professor of Sociology at the Graduate Center, City University of New York. She is the author of a number of books including Woman's Place, Women in Law, Deceptive Distinctions, and most recently The Part-Time Paradox: Time Norms, Professional Life, Family and Gender (with Carroll Seron, Rabert Sauté and Bonnie Oglensky) as well as numerous articles on the workplace and gender. Among her honors and awards she has been a fellow at the Center for Advanced Study in the Behavioral Sciences, a Guggenheim fellow and a Resident Scholar at the Russell Sage Foundation.

William L. F. Felstiner is Scientific Director, International Institute for the Sociology of Law, Onati, Spain and Distinguished Research Professor of Law, Cardiff University.

Gerard Hanlon is a Senior Lecturer at King's College, University of London. He has published books and journal articles on both lawyers and accountants. His most recent book is Lawyers, the State and the Market: Professionalism Revisited. In the past he has worked at University of Nottingham, University of Sheffield and the London School of Economics and he has held Fellowships at the Max Planck Institute in Freiberg and the University of Western Sydney. He is currently leading a major funded research project on call centers in health care.

Lynn C. Jones is Assistant Professor in the Criminal Justice Department at Northern Arizona University. Her primary research interests include the linkages between law and social movements, and between the legal profession and activism. Specifically, she investigates how left-wing cause lawyers are able to negotiate their roles and identities so that activism and lawyering are compatible. Secondary projects look at crisis workers and how they manage their own emotions in the delivery of victim services.

Harris H. Kim is a Ph.D. student in the Department of Sociology at the University of Chicago. He is currently working on his dissertation, which examines the network embeddedness of the U.S. legal services industry. One major line of this work has to do with the changing lawyer-client relationships among top 250 American law firms and their corporate clients. Using the Chicago lawyers' data funded by the American Bar Foundation, he is also investigating the colleague networks of lawyers and how they relate to intra-professional stratification.

Susanne Lace is Research Officer, the Strategic Research Unit, the Law Society of England and Wales. Susanne received her law degree from Oxford University and her Ph.D. in socio-legal studies from Sheffield University, U.K. She qualified as a solicitor in 1992, having worked for law firms in England and Germany. She has conducted research on the legal profession and higher education at various institutions, including the Institute for the Study of the Legal Profession at Sheffield University and the Max-Planck-Institute for Foreign and International Criminal Law in Freiburg, Germany.

Joanne Martin is the Associate Director of the American Bar Foundation, Chicago, IL. She has a J.D. from Loyola University School of Law (Chicago) and an M.B.A. from Northwestern University's Kellogg School of Business. In collaboration with Stephen Daniels, she has focused her research on the American civil justice system. She has also written on law schools and their role in transmitting legal skills to new lawyers.

Mary E. Vogel is Visiting Assistant Professor in the Law and Society Program at the University of California at Santa Barbara. She received her Ph.D. from Harvard University. Professor Vogel has taught at the University of Michigan, Ann Arbor and at Northwestern University. She has been a Visiting Scholar at the American Bar Foundation, the University of London, Wolfson College of Oxford University and the Centre for Socio-Legal Studies there. Her book, Coercion to Compromise: Plea Bargaining, the Courts and the Making of Political Authority, 1830–1920, is being published by Oxford University Press.

Jean E. Wallace is currently an Associate Professor of Sociology at The University of Calgary. She received her Ph.D. in Sociology from the University of Iowa in 1992. She has recently completed a two-year project entitled "Juggling it All" funded by the Law School Admission Council in which she examines the work-family interface and how lawyers cope with the demanding nature of their careers and other aspects of their lives. Her research interests also include the determinants of and interrelationship between organizational and professional commitment, as well as the training, education and mentoring of professionals, with much of this work focusing on members of the legal profession.
