

Driving organisational change in SMEs using service design

Abstract

Purpose: To present a service design-based methodology developed to help small and medium enterprises (SMEs) undertake organisational change.

Methodology: This research used the design science research methodology, which enabled the creation of the Service Design for Organisational Change (SD4OCh) methodology. A real case study of a small service company specialised in neuropsychological disorders was used for the definition and validation of SD4OCh.

Findings: The main outcome of this study is the SD4OCh methodology, which is based on three key stages: diagnosis (knowing where to begin by detecting the organisation's strengths and weaknesses), innovation (improving the structure/processes and designing/redesigning services by employing a customer-centric approach), and implementation (enabling the definition of the route towards organisational change). There is also a transversal evaluation stage, which quantifies the organisational changes.

Originality: Although this is a service design-based research, the SD4OCh methodology was developed in order to enable companies to make holistic changes, namely, to innovate their services, structure, and processes, thus supporting and guiding organisational change.

Research limitations/implications: This study adds valuable knowledge to the service science research field and contributes to the awareness of the usefulness of service design theory within companies, especially those which are small and medium-sized, since they lack the tools and methods required to tackle organisational change, signifying that the challenges they confront are different to those of larger companies.

Keywords: Service Design, Methodology, Organisational Change, Innovation, SMEs.

Table I presents an example of the metric used for each attribute.
